

Communications

Communications play a vital role in disseminating the activities and achievements of Oxford social sciences to external audiences and bringing together the social sciences departments at Oxford. Some departments employ staff specifically to enable communications activity, while in others this may be part of your responsibility as Head of Administration.

The Communications Manager supports the divisional Research & Impact and Development teams. She works closely with the Public Affairs Directorate, and can provide advice on any aspect of events management, strategic communications planning, social media, internal communications, publications and any other aspect of organisational communications.

In order to support internal communications and enhance collaborations between communications professionals in departments, a network - the Social Sciences Communications Group - gets together each term to discuss shared issues, knowledge, experience; as well as consider resource savings. If you would like to be kept informed about the Social Sciences Communications Group meetings, please email communications@socsci.ox.ac.uk. Information from previous meetings can be found on the Social Sciences Communications Group SharePoint site.
